Finding right legal advice for all those separation affects

When faced with the difficult decision of separation from your partner, how do you even begin to go about finding the right legal advice?

You are all bombarded with advertisements from various law firms, but how do you know what is right for you and your circumstances?

The first thing to consider is how the implementation of the law will affect your circumstances.

All law firms are working from the same precedents and, in divorce cases, we all frame your case around the Matrimonial Causes Act.

It is down to interpretation and research.

Often, potential clients believe that once they have instructed a solicitor it is a little like handing over a hot potato, the solicitor firm will run off and eventually produce a settlement for you. This is not the case at all.

You have control over the case and yes, you are paying for advice but not all advice is accepted.

Once the law firm has done its job, your file is closed.

However, from your point of view you now have to live a life which is alien to you.

Law firms must always do whatever they can to protect the family framework.

If there are children involved, you and your former partner will find yourselves having to attend family events together, for the benefit of your children. It is so important that law firms try to ensure that you feel this is achievable.

It is not about destruction of your former partner. It is about what is fair and just for now, and for your future.

At N Legal, we pride ourselves in our personal approach.

We offer a good-quality service at reasonable cost.

Karen Edwards has over 30 years experience in family law and has a sensitive and sensible approach towards all clients.

Customer service is key.

We are lucky to use the services of many professionals to help untangle your case, from financial investigators and mediators through to barristers.
